Bringing a power bank? Read up on the rules

ince 2020, the number of lithium battery incidents aboard commercial aircraft has been on the rise, as recorded by the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA). The incidents involved either fire, smoke or heat from lithium batteries that were carried either as baggage or cargo.

In 2024, there were a total of 85 aviation-related incidents reported, with six incidents reported this year as of February 2025. These incidents are the only ones that the FAA is aware of and by no means a complete list.

The most serious lithium battery incident this year has been the Air Busan fire that destroyed a passenger plane at Gimhae International Airport in South Korea last January 28. Initial investigation suggests that the fire may have started from a power bank that was stored in an overhead compartment.
