Jet-Setter's Oasis

Berber Lodge, Oumnas, Morocco

Marrakesh's hottest new hotel isn't even in the city proper, but rather 14 miles south of the center near the village of Oumnas. There, French-Swiss expat Romain Michel-Ménière, the city's "it" interior designer, has built a minimalist, contemporary version of a Berber village, with low-slung adobe structures and a beautiful 50-foot pool set amid olive groves. For the nine rustic-chic rooms, Michel-Ménière combined the traditional (baked-tile floors, Berber antiques) with the up-to-date (custom wicker and Midcentury Modern furniture) in a way that feels effortlessly sophisticated. Since it opened last spring, the lodge has become a magnet for a fashion-forward crowd—even though the Wi-Fi is spotty at best, making it nearly impossible to post photos to Instagram. Eventually, the glitterati stop taking pictures and just enjoy connecting to the countryside. berberlodge.net; doubles from $205. —Gisela Williams

"Marrakesh is famous for its lavish resorts heavy on Orientalist fantasy. The Berber Lodge feels much more authentic and welcoming."

STYLISH HAVEN

Palácio Tangará, São Paulo

Travelers looking for respite from São Paulo's busy streets will find it at this palatial resort set in Burle Marx Park, a 27-acre oasis. Wrapped around a showpiece swimming pool, the five-story hotel has the air of a Neoclassical mansion, with 141 rooms featuring balconies and French doors. Also notable: Jean-Georges Vongerichten's restaurant, where his signature French cuisine incorporates local ingredients like rare Amazonian fruits. oetkercollection.com; doubles from $380. —Nora Walsh

CREATIVE FORCE

Sanders, Copenhagen

A welcome arrival in a city light on luxe hotels, the Sanders is ballet dancer Alexander Kølpin's third property in Denmark, and it overlooks the theater where he used to perform. The hygge vibe begins in the lobby, where even in summer a fire is ablaze. All 52 rooms have beds with rattan headboards, eclectic prints, and spacious bathrooms. The candlelit breakfast is another highlight, as are drinks at the jewel box of a bar (try the Sherry Fizz). hotelsanders.com; doubles from $437. —Kate Maxwell
